technology. While what students learn for life continuously changing, mathematics remains important in almost all jobs. But what if the students are not doing today's math, today's thinking, and today's work? In the 21st century, students need to be able to think, to work, to communicate. These abilities are a 21st-century readiness skill. In the 21st-century, the emphasis shifts from the fact versus the process. Mathematics needs to create student-centered experiences and learning. They're equipped with resources that extend beyond learning, learning new skills and understanding. They're able to use the information and equipment for problem-solving and learning. They're able to use the information and equipment for problem-solving and learning. They're able to use the information and equipment for problem-solving and learning. They're able to use the information and equipment for problem-solving and learning.
